

Matthew Witenstein is a Ph.D student at the Claremont Graduate University (CGU). He is currently a Research Assistant in the School of Educational Studies at CGU and a Graduate Assistant in the Institutional Research Office at Harvey Mudd College. He has completed his coursework and is currently working towards his doctoral dissertation. His research focus is on comparative and international education with specific interests in immigrant education and pathways through the educational system in developing countries. Much of his research focuses on South Asian populations in South Asia and the diaspora. Some of his current work focuses on the experiences of South Asian students and faculty in higher educational institutions. Matt also sits on the awards committee for the Higher Education SIG at CIES.